Destinata Guerriera investigates the warrior-woman figure that appears in Renaissance poems of chivalry.

While the ends of the care free and playful time of her childhood approaches, this woman comes to apprehend her destiny and begins to develop those traits that will have to be her fundamental qualities: force, courage, determination.

She is a woman, but she is obliged to leave her femininity and wear the chivalric armor, which will make her indistinguishable from cavaliers.

Being a Diana devotee, she is destined to virginity. She is not allowed to love; or she is forced to conceal her romantic feelings.

This is what the warrior woman must look like: strong, brave, determined and indiscernible from men.

But behind this appearance hides the delicate femininity, the sweet sensuality and the capability to love of this young girl, who cannot reveal her real feelings.

Having no other choice than following her fate, this woman becomes persuaded that she is not a delicate girl but a warrior woman: she hides her long hair, she leaves her white gown and she wears the dress that will hide her feminine figure.

Upon taking over her new dress and her new appearance, the warrior woman is ready to fight.

This work invites to reflect about the role of women not only in the mythic-literary context but also in the contemporary world, where the complexity of female identity is still an unsolved issue. Even though literally not compelled to a warrior's fate, contemporary women must deal with the coexistence of their feminine identity, being women, partners, mothers, with the duties and responsibilities of professional life. Today women find themselves occupying roles that for long time have been strictly masculine.
