Eclettica (Eclectic) largely investigates prelinguistic theories: intuition and learning, transmission and empathy, the intangible and innate connections of language. A “universal grammar” Noam Chomsky would say, a tribute to that latent prelinguistic organ that constitutes 95% of the language faculty before it is externalized and instrumentalised. An amazing capacity that among all living things not only humans possess.

Humans store experiences, information, sniff, sort and detect in the act of expressive creation. Aware, able to think and contemplate, they do all this from a totally animal origin. Yet we often fear that we are animals, being part of a divided relationship, having ordered a system around our rational selves.

It is here, now, in this eclectic process of externalizing thought that is accomplished through such means as sound, speech, movement and touch. Themes such as mirroring, struggle between elusive voices of information, inner serenity, embodiment and ownership of one's destiny are addressed.
